At that time, Japan was the world's largest importer of oil, and it was looking for ways to diversify its energy sources. One of the ways it was looking for was to invest in oil fields in Iraq. In 1990, Japan was the world's largest importer of oil, and it was looking for ways to diversify its energy sources. One of the ways it was looking for was to invest in oil fields in Iraq.

But now, with the war in Iraq, the situation has changed. The price of oil has fallen, and many countries are looking for ways to reduce their dependence on oil. Japan is no longer the world's largest importer of oil, and it is no longer looking for ways to diversify its energy sources. In fact, Japan is now looking for ways to reduce its dependence on oil. This is a major shift in Japan's energy policy, and it could have a significant impact on the oil market in Iraq.

French PM blinks, may amend youth jobs law

PARIS (AP) — French Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin said Sunday that his government is considering amending a law that requires employers to hire young people.

Raffarin said the law, which was passed in 1997, has been a failure. He said the law has not helped young people find jobs and has instead created a two-tier labor market.

The law requires employers to hire a certain number of young people, but it has been widely criticized for being too rigid and for not taking into account the needs of businesses. Raffarin said his government is now considering a new law that would give employers more flexibility in hiring young people.
